Alice Hills

Alice Hills is professor of conflict and security at the University of Leeds, where her specialist area is security governance in fragile states. Her research focuses on why public police evolve as they do, and what explains the interactions among the police, governments, militaries and societies, and her current external positions include membership of the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations' International Policing Advisory Council. Hills was a member of the Geneva-based DCAF's International Advisory Board on Border Security, 2001-03, and her publications on border security include an Adelphi paper on Border security in the Balkans: Europe's gatekeepers.

Other books include Policing Africa: Internal Security and the Limits of Liberalization, Future War in Cities: Rethinking a Liberal Dilemma, and the forthcoming Policing Post-Conflict Cities.
